Government contracting: managing the risks

20 years on from the Fitzgerald Inquiry, recent events have focused new attention on government contracting and integrity and probity requirements. Government tendering and contracting processes have come under renewed scrutiny, giving many government agencies reason to reflect on the relevant legislative requirements to be adhered to and risks to be managed.

In this seminar, we will:

- re-examine the relevant legal framework applicable to government tendering and contracting in Queensland, particularly in relation to probity requirements
- discuss some of the proposals for law reform, particularly in relation to activities of lobbyists and consultants
- consider some major areas of risk and strategies for mitigation of those risks
